Shrines of the Holy Land: Part 3

Today I offer the last installment on the shrines of the Holy Land. The Holy Sepulchre is considered to be the central shrine to Christianity for it is the place where Jesus rose from the dead.

Pilgrims who remember the Gospel accounts and look for the hill of Calvary and a tomb cut out of rock in a garden nearby will be disappointed. At first sight, the church may bring on a sense of anticlimax. Looking across a hemmed-in square, there is the shabby façade of a Romanesque basilica with grey domes and a cut-off belfry.
Inside, there is a bewildering conglomeration of 30-plus chapels and worship spaces. These are encrusted with the devotional ornamentation of several Christian rites.

This sense of a conglomerate structure is the result of the place being occupied by three different rites in Christianity. Ownership of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is shared between the Greek Orthodox, Catholics (known in the Holy Land as Latins), and Armenian Orthodox.
The Catholics own the Franciscan Chapel of the Apparition (which commemorates the tradition that the risen Christ first appeared to his Mother) and the deep underground Chapel of the Finding of the Cross. The Greeks own its central worship space, known as the Katholikon or Greek choir.
The Armenians own the underground Chapel of St Helena. The complicated rights of possession and use are spelled out by a decree, called the Status Quo, which gives two families the sole right to hold the keys to the shrine.
